

CHILDREN'S BOOK
COLLECTION Gift of LIBRARY OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA S
LOS ANGELS

E LOS ANGELES P

17 - 1 d-

Hubert formes Generally his tracker thanks Hickortanimas Cornish

Frontispiece

Galler Pippin & Peter at Lady Bountitle

sacted John Jerming

THE

Interesting History,

Parous kex OF pippin Little King Pippin

London Published by Tomes Imitay.
20, Teatherstone Stily Road!
PRICE FOURPENCE

THE

HISTORY

01

Little King Pippin.

PETER PIPPIN was the son of Gaffer and Gammar Pippin,

"Who lived at the ivy-house under the hill,

And if they are not gone, they live there still.

This is the house, and a pretty little snug place it is, and there are Peter, and his father and mother at the door Daddy, says Peter, I wish I could have another little book, for I have read Mrs Lovechild's Golden present so often, that I can repeat it without a book. I am very glad to hear it, Peter, says his father, and I wish I could afford to buy you books as fast as you can learn them. I have been saving a penny a week these five weeks, to buy the LADDER to LEARNING for you: well then says Peter, I have got a penny, which was given me this morning by Miss Kitty Kindness, so that will make sixpence: oh, dear, I should like vastly to have the Ladder to Learning, and you shall see how fast I will climb up it; pray give me your five-pence, father, and I will run to farmer Giles with it directly, and desire him to bring it down for me when he goes to London next week; and away he run to farmer Giles, and gave him the money to buy the Ladder to Learning.

Now a great many silly boys would have spent that penny in apples or gingerbread, or some such trash, and when they have eaten it, what would they have been the better for it? Why nothing at all; but Peter did not lay out his money in such an idle manner; whenever he got a penny, he bought food for his mind, instead of his belly, and you will find he afterwards reaped the benefit of it.

Well, the next week Peter had his new book, sat reading it under a hedge, where he was sent to keep away the crows from farmer Giles's corn; and you see he neither neglected his book nor his work.

- "Away, away, John Carrion Crow,
- "Your master has enow
- "Down in his barley-mow."

See how he makes them fly, and as soon as they are gone, out he whips his little book, and reads till they come back again, for Gaffer Pippin being but a poor labouring man, could not afford to keep Peter at school, so he was obliged to go out to work, though he was but six years old.

But good fortune is generally attendant on good and virtuous actions, and so it happened to Peter, who was certainly one of the best boys in the whole country; he always did what his father and mother bid him, not only without murmuring, but with pleasure in his countenance; he never went to bed, or got up in the morning, without kneeling down by his bed-side to say hisprayers; nor was he ever known to tell a fib, or say a naughty word, or to quarrel with his play-fellows.

As he was coming home from work one evening, wishing for another new book, he could not help crying, because he had no money to buy one: so being met by Lady

Bountiful, whose country seat was but a small distance from the little ivy-house, she asked him what he cried for Peter was afraid to tell at first, lest she should be angry with him; but her ladyship insisted on knowing, and Peter was determined never to tell a fib, so out came the truth: well, says she, Peter, you need not have been ashamed to tell me; there is no harm in it; dry up your tears : I know you are a good boy, very dutiful to your parents, and obliging to every one: and since I find you are so desirous of improving your mind, you shall not be deprived of the benefit of education because you are poor; so do you and your father come to me to-morrow morning, and I will see what I can do for you. Peter returned her ladyship a great many thanks, made one of his best bows, and ran home whistling and singing as merry as a grig; as soon as he got within side the door, good news, good news, says he, father, you and I are to go to Lady Bountiful's tomorrow morning; I believe her ladyship is going to put me to school; Peter's head was so full of it, that he scarce slept a wink all the night; and he got up the next morning at four o'clock, put on his Sunday cloaths, washed his face and hands, combed out his hair, and looked as brisk as a bee; and about six o'clock away his father and he trudged to Lady Bountifuls; as soon as they arrived, they were ordered into her ladyship's parlour. Well, says she, Gaffer Pippin, since you cannot afford to put Peter to school. I will send him at my own expence; so carry this letter to Mr. Teachum, the schoolmaster, and he will be taken as much care of, as if he was my own son. A thousand blessings on your ladyship; says the old man, I hope God Ahnighty will reward you for your goodness to my poor boy. It is no more than Peter deserves, says her ladyship, and as long as he continues such a good boy, he shall not want a friend; but make haste, away with him, Gaffer Pippin, or you will not get there before it is dark, for they had near twenty miles to walk; so taking Peter in his hand, they set off towards school; but they had not walked above a mile or two, beforethey were ovetaken by a gentleman's coach, which stopped as soon as it came up with them, and the gentleman looking out, asked, if that was not little Peter Pippin, whom he had heard was such a good boy? Yes, Sir, replied Gaffer Pippin, it is Indeed, says the gentleman, I thought so, from that good nature so visible in his countenance; pray how far are you going? To Mr. Teadrum's school, Sir, replied Peter; a very fortunate meeting, says the gentleman, I am going to the very same place with my two sons, so you shall ride with them in my coach; you need not trouble yourself to go any farther, Gaffer

Pippin, I will take care of your son; so thanking the gentleman for his kindness, and bestowing his blessing on Peter, the old man returned home to his work. As soon as Peter was seated in the coach, the gentleman informed him he was going to a school, where he would meet with kind usage and good entertainment. You live very well, says he to his son, don't you, Tommy? Yes, Sir, very well, replied Tommy, we have apple-pye two or three times a week: then I dare say you know how to spell applepye, don't you Tommy? O yes, Sir, ap-pel-pey. And how do you spell it, Billy? says he to his other son: appel py. And how do you spell it, Peter? ap-ple-pye, Sir.

That's right, you are a good boy. and there is sixpence for you; and as. for you two dunces, I will take care you shall neither of you have another bit of apple-pye, till you know how to spell it, and he was as good as his word: for tho' all the rest of the boys had apple-pye the next day for dinner, neither of them were suffered to eat a bit, because they had not learned to spell it; so they were obliged to sit and look at the rest, like two blockheads as they were.

The same affable behaviour which had gained him the esteem of all his acquaintance at home, soon made little Peter equally respected at school; nay all the good boys were so pleased with the sweetness of his temper, and the good advice which he always gave them, when any quarrel or disagreement happened between them, that they came to a resolution to elect him their king, by the title of king of the good boys and he was always afterwards called LITTLE KING PIPPIN, (so we shall give him the same title through the remainder of his history) and all disputes between them of whatever nature were referred to his decision; and so great was their respect for their king, and so just were his determinations on these occasions, that they were always submitted to without murmuring or repining; as a badge of distinction for their new king, they made a general subscription, and bought him a fine cap, ornamented with a white feather, and round it was engraven in letters of gold, Peter Pippin, King of the good boys.

A few days after Peter was chosen king; as George Graceless, Neddy Never-pray, and two or three other boys, as naughty as themselves, were playing at marbles in the church-yard, George Graceless's brother Jack, woo was a very goodnatured little boy, happened to stop his brother George's marble by accident, upon which he flew into a violent passion, took the Lord's. name in vain, called his brother fool, and made use of a great many other wicked expressions which so shocked Little King Pippin, who was sitting on a tomb-stone just by, reading Mrs. Winlove's Lectures, that he could not forbear speaking to little Graceless.

Pray, Master Graceless, says he, do you know the consequence of these shocking expressions; did you never read in your bible, that "whoever calleth his brother fool is in danger of hell fire;" and don't you know, that one of the commandments says, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain?

Where can you expect to go when you die? Pooh, says little Graceless, don't tell me any of your nonsensical stuff about dying; I have many a good year to live yet; do you mind your reading, and let me alone to my play. Oh fy, Oh fy, Master Graceless, says Little King Pippin, God Almighty, if he pleased, could strike you dead this moment; and however secure you may think yourself, be assured,

There's not a sin that you commit,

Nor wicked word you say,
But in God's dreadful book 'tis writ,

Against the judgment day.

There's not a fib that e'er was told, Or evil thought arose,

But in that book is safe enrolled,
As that day will disclose.

Shah, says he, I am not afraid of that, and away he went singing,

Let us be merry and gay,
And drive away care and sorrow;
We'll laugh and sing to day,
And think about death to morrow;

as thoughtless and unconcerned, as if he had done nothing amiss; and now the clock striking two, which was the hour for returning to school: Billy Meanwell, Sammy Sober, Bobby Bright, Tommy Telltruth, and all the rest of the good boys, with Little King Pippin at their head, ran as fast as they could, to try who could get into school first; but George Graceless and his companions, being on the other side of the church, saw nothing of their running into school, and their minds were so taken up with play, that they never heard the clock strike, and continued playing so long, till they were afraid to go in, so at last they agreed to play truant, and away they all went together a bird's nesting.

The first nest they found was a poor little robin-redbreast's, which one of them, whose name was Harry Harmless, and who was not so hard-hearted as the rest, persuaded them not to destoy; for, it was that goodnatured bird that covered over the poor little children in the wood with leaves, when they were starved to death; Pooh, says George Graceless and Tom Tyger, what signifies talking such stuff as that, and down they pulled the poor Robin's eggs, nest and all, and left the pretty little bird making such piteous moans, as would have melted a heart of stone.

They began now to see the folly and wickedness of neglecting their books for idle mischief, and heartily repented that they had not staid at school, instead of playing truant; but dreading to appear before their master, both on account of their own naughty behaviour, and the melancholy accident which had happened to George Graceless, they strolled about from one field to another till it was quite dark, and then went and laid themselves ander some bushes in an adjacent wood, where they fell asleep; but alas! their sleep was very short, for in less than an hour they were awakened by such terrible howlings of wild beasts as were scarce ever heard. Harry Harmless requested them all to betake themselves to prayer to God Almighty, to guard and protect them from the terrible dangers which now surrounded them. But, oh shame to tell, not one of them except Harry Harmless himself, could repeat, or indeed had ever learned a single prayer; upon which Harry, justly concluding that those naughty boys, who had so totally neglected their duty to their Creator, could have no claim whatever to his protection, thought he should be in more safety alone than in such wicked company, therefore moved at a distance from them, and kneeled down to prayers by himself; and he had had not left them but a few minutes, before two monstrous lions came and devoured every one of them; after they had eaten these wicked boys, they went up to Harry Harmless, but instead of devouring him as they had the others, they seemed as fond of him as a dam of her young, licked his face and hands with their tongues, and then laid down quietly on the ground by his side, for God Almighty had heard his prayers, as he always will those of all good little boys and girls, and had converted the natural rage and fierceness of these dreadful beasts into the meekness and gentleness of lambs.

When morning came, Harry found he had wandered so far from home, that he could not tell which way to return; but as he was sitting on the side of a bank, reflecting on the danger and folly of keeping such naughty company, and the many wicked ways little boys are too often undesignedly led into by that means, he was surprised by the neighing of a horse, and looking round, there was the prettiest milk-white little creature galloping towards him that ever was seen, with a little bridle on, and a saddle and stirrups on his back, and running directly up to Harry, he fell down on his knees, seemingly to invite him to get on his back: Harry was almost afraid to trust himself on the little horse at first, but recollecting that the same Almighty hand which had rescued him from the paws of the lions, could protect him from every other danger, he mounted on his back, and he was no sooner seated, but the pretty little thing galloped away with him as fast as he could run, and never stopped till he brought him within a little distance of his home; when, dropping down again on his knees, in the same manner as when he took him up. Harry imagining it to be the signal for him to dismount, immediately alighted, and letting go the bridle, the little white horse set off neighing and galloping, as when he first found him, and was out of sight in an instant.

As soon as the unhappy account of the death of George Graceless and his companions was made known to their master, he was obliged to dispatch a messenger to inform their parents, and the shocking news had such a melancholy effect on George Graceless's papa and mamma, that they both died of a broken heart within a month afterwards; and the parents of the other naughty boys were so greatly afflictthat it rendered the remainder of their lives miserable.

Such were the fatal consequences of these naughty boys neglecting that duty-which every one owes to his Maker; and which, above all things, should never be forgotton; for, had they learned their prayers, and said them every night and morning, they would not have been at a loss to have repeated them when they were surrounded by wild beasts, and then, no doubt, God Almighty would have saved them as well as Harry Harmless; and, instead of being the means of breaking their parents' hearts, they might, have lived to have been the comfort and support of their old age, and perhaps have become as great men as you will find Little King Pippin did.

As Little King Pippin grew in years, he rose in the esteem of every one who knew him, and his acquaintance was courted by all the good boys in the school, who frequently invited him, at the request of their parents, to spend the holidays with them.

Among others he went one Christmas with the son of Sir William Worthy, a wealthy London merchant. This gentleman, in whom merit always found a friend, was so highly pleased with the engaging affability of King Pippin's disposition, as well as the great proficiency he made in the several branches of learning, that he thenceforward took him under his protection, and as soon as he arrived at a proper age, placed him in his countinghouse, in which situation he conducted himself so much to Sir William's satisfaction, that having occasion to send out a person to superintend some plantations which he possessed abroad, King Pippin was fixed on for that purpose,

A ship being provided and exery thing in readiness for the voyage, after taking a most affectionate leave of his parents and friends, he set sail for these plantations, which were situated in one of the West-India islands, About a fortnight after their departure, they had the misfortune to lose the captain's son, a little boy about eight or nine years of age, who fell from the ship's side when she was under full sail, and was drowned, in spite of every effort to save him. This melancholy accident is another striking instance of the unhappy consequences of children's disobedience to their parents.

The little boy here alluded to, used frequently to get on the outside of the ship, and let himself down by a rope, to paddle in the sea; he had been several times detected by his papa in playing those frolics, and as often reproved for it, and warned of the danger, but to little purpose; for he was one of those headstrong, undutiful children (of whom I fear there are too many) who, as soon as they are out of their parents sight, forget the good advice and prudent cautions which have been given them, and pursue each idle fancy that enters their heads, without once considering either the folly or danger of it, till they are convinced by fatal experience, that their parents are much more capable of judging what is proper for them than they are for themselves.

After this accident, they proceeded on their voyage for several weeks, with very favourable weather, and had got so near the destined harbour, that they expected to have made it the next day, but in this they were unhappily disappointed; for about ten in the evening they were overtaken by the most violent storm, that the oldest seaman onboard had ever remembered.

The next morning, as soon as it was light, they perceived that the ship was carried towards the land with the greatest rapidity; and, as they every moment expected, about nine o'clock she struck upon a rock; the boat was immediately hoisted out, and every one on-board crowded into her, except King Pippin, who, imagining that being so overloaded she could not possibly reach the shore, preferred remaining on the wreck:

In this dangerous situation, expecting that the ship would go to pieces every moment, he continued till the afternoon, when the stormbegan to abate, and the sea became tolerably calm, and by the ebb of the tide the ship was much nearer the land than when she first struck.

After returning thanks to God Almighty for his great goodness to-wards him, in preserving him alone of the whole ship's crew, King Pippin began to consider in what manner he should spend the night, which now drew on apace.

Not knowing but there might be wild beasts on the island, he was for some time at a loss how to secure himself, till recollecting he had read of Robinson Crusoe, when he was cast away on an uninhabited island, had spent the night on the top of a thick tree, he had recourse to the same method, and after the great fatigue he had undergone, slept very soundly till morning, when he descended from his new lodging, and walked about the island to discover if it was inhabited; but not being able to find the least traces of any human creature, he returned towards the sea-side, in hopes that some of the ship's provisions might be driven on shore; in this too, however he was disappointed, and hunger obliged him to set about inventing a snare for taking some of the goats, of which he had seen great numbers in his morning walk; but they were so exceeding wild, that it prov ? a very laborious task, and employed the greatest part of King Pippin,s time during his stay on the island; indeed he was sometimes so unsuccessful, that a few vegetables alone were his only subsistance for days together

Some months after he had been cast away on this solitary place, being one day greatly fatigued by a fruitless pursuit of some of these goats, he sat himself down by the side of a hill, and looking with desponding eyes toward the sea, he flattered himself that he saw something like a sail at a great distance; after gazing eagerly for several hours, without once suffering his attention to be diverted from the wished-for object, he was at last, to his unspeakable joy, convinced that it was a ship, and that slie was making directly for the land: about five o'clock in the evening they came to anchor, at a small distance from the shore, and having hoisted out. their boat, rowed directly into a little creek near the edge of a wood, where King Pippin, having descended from the hill, had concealed himself; as soon as they landed, he perceived as well by their dress as their language, that they were his countrymen, he discovered himself to them, and was received with the greatest kindness and humanity, and to add to the happiness of his delivery, he found upon inquiry, that they were going to the same island. for which he had been originally bound, but had been driven so far out of their course by a violent storm, which they had encountered a few days before.

Immediately upon their arrival King Pippin took upon him the care of Sir William Worthy's estate, and adopted such prudent regulations in the management of it, as rendered it in a few years almost double in its value; in return for which care and assiduity, he was taken into partnership by Sir William.

This good fortune, however did not fill his mind with that pride and ostentation, two frequently attendant on success in life; King Pippin still continued the same engaging respect to his acquaintance, and the same courteous affability to his inferiors, which had marked his character in every sphere of life, nor did it pass unrewarded; for the governor of the island falling a sacrifice to those pestilential diseases which are common to hot climates, the inhabitants unanimously joined in a petition to the king, requesting him to appoint King Pippin his successor to the government, recommending him as a person endowed with every qualification requisite to the happiness of his subjects.

It would fill a volume to relate the numerous acts of justice, and benevolence, performed by him during his government; suffice it therefore to say that under so good a governor, the people enjoyed freedom, content, and happiness.

Harnet is my name on my nation

